

School Board Chairman Wants More Unity

School Committee discussion this week on the accuracy of press accounts and minutes of board meetings prompted Chairman John Langmaid to request a depersonalization of minutes and more board unity.

Board members Patricia Walsh and Martha Gjestebj had requested clarification of points which they found to be inaccurately reported in the Cohasset Mirror and Cohasset Mariner. Superintendent John Maloney suggested a reading of the minutes to elucidate these points, but Langmaid declared further discussion of the matter out of order.

After changes in minutes continued for almost an hour, a practice which has been the rule of most of the board's meetings, Maloney was compelled to go the blackboard and diagram the dilemma. He outlined the difficulties reporters and the recording secretary face when trying to accurately recount a meeting after the ebb and flow of hours of discussion and individual comments.

Maloney suggested that to conduct meetings more expeditiously, less time should be spent changing minutes. He proposed that one way to do this was to note the committee's actions rather than discussion.

"Too much time is being spent at the beginning of meetings trying to resolve what was said last week. Rehashing the minutes only brings out antagonisms," he said.

Gjestebj recommended that the secretary send rough drafts of the minutes to the board members for appraisal, so that they might return their comments and corrections. Secretary Margaret Sullivan balked at this suggestion, feeling that this practice wouldn't necessarily aid in a better minute consensus.

Langmaid said he had been noticing a trend toward the specific and personal in the minutes, which are often four or five pages long. He stressed the working of the committee as a whole and the inadvisability of lengthy personal comment in the minutes.
